Blush (blʌʃ), *v.*¹ Pa. t. and pple. blushed, blusht (blʌʃt). Forms: 4–6 blusche, blusshe, 4 bloschе, 4–5 blysche, 5 blushe, 6 bluse, 6– blush. (Rare pa. t. in 5 blist = blyscht). [Evidently re ated to a series of words found in Old Norse and Low German, but not known in OHG., or Gothic, pointing back to a stem *blūsi- from verba root *blīs- in sense of 'burn, glow, be red'. Cf. OE. blysian in ablisian to blush, ablysung, ablysgung 'redness of confusion, shame', with MDu. blāzen, blōzen (from earlier bleussen), Du. blozen to blush, blos (formerly bleus) blush, MLG. blosen, bloschen: also OE. blysa wk. masc., blyscge wk. fem., ON. blys neut. 'torch' (Sw. bloss torch, blossa to blaze, Da. blus torch, blusse to blaze, to blush), LG. blüse flame, blüsen to set on fire, bleusteren to inflame, glow, become red. The nearest relatives of ME. blusche, blosche, blysche, are app MLG. bloschen, LG blüsken (Brem. Wb. I. 105): and its antecedent form is perhaps to be found in OE. blyscan, bliscan 'rutilare' (in the Aldhelm Glosses, Mone Q. und F. 355): but its comparatively late appearance in ME., apparently first in the north, its various vowel-forms, and the doubtful relations of the senses, esp. sense 2, all combine to leave the history of the word very obscure. OE. blyscan, bliscan, has also been conjectured to be for blīcsian, from root *blīk- to shine in which case it would not be related to the blūsi- words, nor to ME. blusche. (The Da. deponent blues to blush, may also be compared.)]

Prof. Skeat also compares an East Frisian blüstern to bluster, from blüssen to blow, akin to blasen; and it is worthy of note that the Sc. pronunciation is (blüster). Board (bōəɹd), sb. Forms: 1–7 bord, (4–6 borde), 4–7 boord, (5–6 boorde, beurde, 6–7 bourd, 6 boarde), 6– board; north. 4–8 burd, 4–7 burde, 4 Sc. buird, 6– Sc. brod: cf. Bred. [A word or agglomeration of words of complicated history, representing two originally distinct sbs., already blended in OE., and subsequently reinforced in ME. by French uses of one of them, and possibly by Scandinavian uses of one or both. (1) OE. had bord[1] neut. 'board, plank, shield, ? table', a Common Teut. str. neut. sb., = OFris. and OS. bord (MDu. bort -de, Du. boord 'board', bord 'shelf, plate, trencher'), MHG. and mod.G. bort 'board', Goth. baurd in fotubaurd 'foot-stool', ON. borð 'board, plank, table, maintenance at table' (Sw. and Da. bord table):—OTeut. bord-o(m*, repr. an Aryan bhrdhom*, Skr. bṛdham*: see Bred sb. (2) OE. had bord[2] 'border, rim, side, ship's side', esp. in phrases innan, utan bordes, also a Common Teut. sb., orig. str. masc. but often also (by confusion with bord[1]) neuter: cf. OS. bord masc. (? neut.), MDu. bort, boort -de, Du. boord masc., 'border, edge, ship's side', OHG., MHG. bort masc., mod.G. bord masc. (and neut.) 'margin, border, ship-board', ON. borð neut. 'margin, shore, ship-board' (Sw., Da. bord 'ship-board'):—OTeut. bord-oz* side, border, rim. (3) Relationship between these two words is uncertain: Franck suggests that bord[2] is a ppl. form from vbl. root ber- to raise, representing an Aryan bhrtós* 'raised, made projecting'. But the two were associated and confused at an early date: in most of the Teutonic langs., some of the senses of the masc. word, in ON. and perh. in OE. all of them, have gone over to the neuter. It is certain that the sense 'side or board of a ship' belongs to bord[2]; so prob. did that of 'shield', the original sense being 'rim, limb, or border of the shield'; the sense 'table' is doubtful. (4) The WGer. bord[2] masc. 'border, edge, coast, side, ship's side' was adopted in Romanic, giving med.L. bordus, It., Sp., Pg. bordo, F. bord. In the ME. period, and subsequently, the French use of the word has in return greatly influenced the Eng., so that certain modern uses and phrases of board are really from French. It is also possible that the development in ME. was in some points (see branch II.) due to Scandinavian uses.]

14. On board (beside the technical sense in 12 c) has now, in common use, the meaning: On or in a ship, boat, etc.; into or on to a ship. That this expression is elliptical, is witnessed by the fuller form on ship-board (cf. ME. 'within schippe burdez' in 12), and the construction 'on board of the ship', or 'on board the ship' (where it is perhaps often supposed that 'board' means the deck).

On board appears to be a later expansion (cf. a-foot, on foot) of Aboard, a-bord, and this to have been taken directly from Fr. à bord, as in aller ou monter à bord, être à bord, short for au bord du vaisseau, in which bord 'ship's side' comes contextually to be equal to 'ship' itself. Similar phrases are used in other modern Teut langs., as Du. aan boord, Ger. an bord, Sw., Da. om skibsbord. Although on borde occurs poetically in OE., and vpon borde in ME., in sense of 'in, upon ship', these appear to have no historical connexion with the later a-board, which begins about 1500, and on board, which appears late in the 17th c.

[Found in beginning of 18th c.: the coal was then dragged from the 'face' in sledges over wooden boards or deals laid down as 'ways'. It is suggested that board thus came to mean 'way', 'passage.' Cf. Boardways Course in 18.]

[ME. bōst sb., bōsten vb. are both found before 1300: their mutual relation and origin are unknown. (The Celtic words, Welsh bostio, Gael. bòsd, etc., which have been hastily assumed as the source, appear to be merely adopted from English.) Various conjectures and comparisons may be seen in Wedgwood, and E. Müller, but nothing to purpose.

The phonetic history of boast, showing ME. long ō surviving as mod. Eng. long ō (oa) in north. as well as standard Eng., shows that boast is not:—OE. bāst*, which would have given north. ME. bast, mod. baist (cf. ghaist, maist, Sc. for ghost, most); nor:—OE. bōst*, which would have given mod. boost, north. buist; nor:—OE. bost*, which would have retained short o (cf. frost); but from a word of later (foreign) introduction. Its phonetic analogues are the Romanic words in -ost, with the o lengthened in later Eng., coast, roast, toast, host, post, which would lead us to expect an OF. boster*; but of this no trace has been found.]

Boat (bōut). Forms: 1-3 bát, 4 bot, 4-5 boot, (4-6 boote), 4-7 bote, 6-7 boate, (6 botte, boitt, 7 Sc. pl. bottes), 6- boat; north. 4-6 bate, 5-6 bait, bayt, (5 pl. bat(t)is). [OE. bát: the subsequent phonetic history in Eng. is perfectly normal; but the origin of the OE. word, and its relation to forms in other languages presents difficulties.

OE. bát (unless onomatopoeic) must have been either the regular representative of an OTeut. baito-*, (-ə-), or an adoption of a word bát from some other language. (1) The chief relevant fact in Teutonic is that ON. had also bát-r in the sense 'small boat', whence regularly Sw. båt, Da. baad 'boat'. But the OE. and ON. words were not cognate, since the ON. form corresponding to OE. bát would have been beit-r*, while the OE. form corresp. to ON. bát-r (=OTeut. báito-) would have been bát, bét*, giving mod. Eng. beet*. In one of the two langs., therefore, bát- must have been adopted from the other: the accessible evidence is on the whole in favour of its priority in OE. This is further favoured by the actual occurrence in ON. of a neuter sb. beit 'boat' (Hávamál st. 90, etc.), which, exc. in gender, is the required form corresponding to OE. bát, from OTeut. baito-*. It is therefore highly probable that the OE. bát is original, and bátr an ON. adoption of it. (2) In any case the absence of the word from continental West Germanic is remarkable: here an OTeut. baito-* would have given OS. bêt, Du. beet, OHG. beiz, Ger. beiz; an OTeut. báto-* would have given OS. bát, Du. baat, OHG. bâz, mod.G. baz. No such forms exist; on the contrary, mod. Du., LG. and mod.G. have actually boot: of these the Ger. word is a recent adoption from LG. or Du. boot, found in early MDu. c 1250, the o of which can be accounted for only by its adoption from early MF., or from Scand., at a date when the á of these langs. had already become (ǫ). (3) A stem bát- or bait- must have had an early diffusion in Romanic: cf. F. bateau, OF. batel, Pr. batelh, Cat. batell, Sp. batel, It. batello (Florio), now battello, diminutives from a primitive bâto, batto* (the latter actually used in It. in sense of 'small sea-vessel'), OF. bat 'small boat' found in 12th c.; med.L. had also bâtus, battus, the former app. only in English documents, the latter (as well as batellus) continental. But no etymology of these is found in Romanic; on the contrary Diez can only refer them back to OE. bát: this is extremely improbable; and the difficulties are only a little lessened by substituting ON. bátr as the presumed source. Moreover this derivation requires bâtus* as the original type, while the form really indicated by OF., med.L., and It. is battus*. Unless the latter could be a neben-form of bâtus (cf. It. tutto, beside L. tôtus, Sp. todo etc.), it could hardly have any etymological connexion with English-Norse bát-. A Celtic source has been frequently attributed to both the OE. and Romanic words; but Celtic scholars now know that the cited OWelsh bat, Welsh bad, is merely an adoption of the OE. word. (4) Franck points out that, in MDu., boot fem. meant 'cask', as in mod.Sc. meal-boat = cask, barrel, tub', prob. identical with F. botte, Pr. and Sp. bota, It. botte, med.Lat. bota, butta, BUTT; and suggests that this may bear at least upon the Du. and LG. boot: it is true that words of general sense like 'vessel', contenant, and specific words like 'tub', have been applied to ships and boats; but besides that no vestige of any such sense as 'cask, tub', etc. appears either in ON. or OE. bát, these last could in no way be connected in form with bota, botta, or butta. (5) The conclusions at present tenable are, therefore, that apparently there was an OTeut. baito-*, preserved only in ON. beit and OE. bát; that the latter was also adopted in ON. as bát-r, and that either from Eng. or Norse the word was adopted in Low Ger. and Dutch, as bát, boot. But that the Romanic batto, bâto, and its family, arose out of this English-Norse word is very doubtful.]

Bocardo, bokardo (bǫkā·rdo). [In med. L. the logical term goes back to the 12th or 13th c. On the question of its relation to senses 2, 3, there appears to be no evidence: the conjecture has been offered that the prison may have been named in jocular reference to the impossibility of directly reducing this mood to the First Figure, or because it was considered an awkward form of the syllogism to get out of. The mutual relation of senses 2 and 3 is also uncertain: so far as the evidence goes, 2 may be a specific use of 3, or 3 a generalized application of 2. If the prison was named from the scholastic term, there would be an appropriateness in the name being first given in Oxford.]

1. Logic. A mnemonic word, representing by its vowels the fifth mood of the third figure of syllogisms, in which the premisses are a particular negative and a universal affirmative, and the conclusion a particular negative, the middle term being the subject of both premisses: thus some M is not P; all M is S; some S is not P.

The form naturally suggests a dim. in -kin: but no primitive of the required form appears in Eng. or other related language. The phonetic history is also difficult.

(In default of finding it elsewhere, the derivation has been sought in Celtic. The Welsh bido'gyn 'little dagger', fixed on by some, must be discarded, both because it is accented on the penult, and because the ME. word was itself adopted in Welsh as bwythin; but some still think it possible that boydekin may have originated in some kind of corruption of Ir. bideog, Gael. biodag, Welsh bidog dagger.)]

Body (bǫ·di). Forms: 1 bodiz, 3 bodiȝ, 3–4 bodi, bode, 3–7 bodie, 4–6 bodye, 6 bodey, 3–body. [OE. bodig neut., elsewhere in Teut. only in OHG. potah, botah, MHG. botich, -ech, potih str. masc. 'body'; cf. mod.Bav. dial. bottech the 'body' of a chemise, Grimm. The word has died out of Ger., its place being taken by leib, orig. 'life', and körper from Lat.: but, in Eng., body remains as a great and important word.

Since Ger. botah, potah, with final h, is not the exact phonetic equivalent of OE. bodiȝ, there is ground for supposing that the word has been adopted in both from some foreign source. E. Müller connects botah with botahha fem., mod.G. bottich masc. 'cask, tub, vat', identified by Wackernagel with med.L. butica = Gr. ἀπο-θήκη. But there does not appear to be any clear way of connecting the two words. (Fick's conjectural derivation from bhadh 'to bind' is out of the question. Gaelic bodhaig is from Eng.)

1. north. dial. A low strong truck upon four small wheels, also called trolly, hurly, etc. 'A kind of cart with low wheels and long shafts, used by masons to remove large stones' (Peacock Lonsdale Gloss.); 'a rude contrivance for moving heavy articles, consisting of a simple plank on low wheels' (*Lanc. Hence, in general use, the low truck used by platelayers on a railway.

Bogie, variant of BOGY.

Bogle (bō·g'l). Forms: 5–6 bogill, 7 bogell, 8– bogle; 7–9 north. Eng. boggle. [Of the various names bogle, boggard, bogy, applied to a goblin, bogle is the earliest known, being common in Scottish literature since 1500. In the present century its use by Burns, Scott, Hogg, and others has introduced it into English literature; but the special English form seems to be boggle (with short o as in BOGGARD), found in north. Eng. dialects from Cumberland to Lincolnshire. The derivation of the whole group is uncertain: the primitive may be bogge, BOG sb.[2], and this may be a variant of bugge, BUG; which is not improbably a. Welsh bwg (= bug) ghost, bugbear, hobgoblin. The form of bogle, boggle, would still remain unexplained: it is perhaps worth while to compare Welsh bugwl (= bu·gul) 'terror, terrifying' (whence bygylu bə·gə·lii to terrify), and bygel (or bugail) nos a hobgoblin of the night: see BUG. But there are also German words of similar form and meaning, bögge and boggel-mann 'a bogy, a bogle': so that uncertainty attaches to the source. Cf. BOGGARD.]

Bogus (bō·gəs), (sb.[1]) a. [A cant word of U. S., about the origin of which many guesses have been made, and 'bogus' derivations circumstantially given.

Dr. S. Willard, of Chicago, in a letter to the editor of this Dictionary, quotes from the Painesville (Ohio) Telegraph of July 6 and Nov. 2, 1827, the word bogus as a sb. applied to an apparatus for coining false money. Mr. Eber D. Howe, who was then editor of that paper, describes in his Autobiography (1878) the discovery of such a piece of mechanism in the hands of a gang of coiners at Painesville, in May 1827; it was a mysterious-looking object, and some one in the crowd styled it a 'bogus', a designation adopted in the succeeding numbers of the paper. Dr. Willard considers this to have been short for tantrabogus, a word familiar to him from his childhood, and which in his father's time was commonly applied in Vermont to any ill-looking object; he points out that tantarabobs is given in Halliwell as a Devonshire word for the devil. BOGUS seems thus to be related to BOGY, etc.]

Bogy, bogey (bō·gi). Also boguey, bogie. Pl. bogies. [Found in literature only recently; old people vouch for its use in the nursery as early as 1825, but only as proper name (sense 1). Possibly a southern nursery form of bogle, boggle, and bugaard, or going back like them to a simpler form which, as mentioned under Bug and Bogle, may be a variant of bugge, Bug 'terror, bugbear, scarecrow'. But in the absence of evidence, positive statements concerning its relation to these words cannot be made. (That they are connected with the Slavonic bog 'god', is a mere fancy from the similarity of form, without any evidence.)]

The later variants boisteous, boystuous, led to the modern BOISTEROUS.

Bond (bɒnd), sb.[2] and a. Forms: 3–6 bonde, (5 bounde, 6 band(e, bund), 3- bond. [Early ME. bonde:—OE. bonda, bunda husbandman, householder, husband, a. ON. bónd(-i), contr. of búande, búlande 'occupier and tiller of the soil, peasant, husbandman; husband', ppl. sb. from búa, bía to dwell, L. colère, and thus equivalent in sense and etymology to Ger. bauer. In Iceland the bónde was a peasant proprietor 'including all owners of land from the petty freeholder to the franklin. In the more despotic Norway and Denmark, bóndi became a word of contempt, denoting the common low people; and in mod.Da. bönder means plebs. In the Icelandic Commonwealth the word has a good sense, and is often used of the foremost men..this notion of the word (a franklin) still prevails in the mind of Icelanders' (Vigf.). In OE., bonda, bunda appears first in the Laws of Cnut, apparently in the same sense as in ON., and nearly, if not entirely, = OE. ceorl. When, through the effects of the Norman Conquest, the ceorl sank from the position of a free-man tilling his own land to that of a tenant bound to certain services to a lord (see Freeman Norm. Conq. V. 477), bonde became equivalent to 'villain', and so at length to 'serf, slave' (sense 3), and was thenceforth evidently associated with Bond sb.[1] and Bound. Hence the occas. variant bande: but bounde may represent the OE. variant bunda.]

The ON., OHG., MHG., and Du., have, beside the general sense 'bone', the specific sense 'shank (of the leg)', which is the ordinary sense in mod.Ger. Hence it has been suggested that the original meaning was 'long bone'; and that the word may have connexion with the ON. adj. bein-, nom. masc. beinn, 'straight'. But this is a bare conjecture; the standing of the ON. adj. being itself obscure. In English there has never been any tendency to the specific sense, for which OE. had sceanca Shank.]

Pl. books; in 1 bóc, béc. [A com. Teut. word, differing however in gender and other points in the various langs. With OE. bóc monosyllabic fem. (pl. béc) cf. These forms indicate an OTeut. bôk-s* str. fem., the plural of which was in OHG. and elsewhere sometimes made neuter (after the analogy of neuter monosyllabic plurals), and this gender extended to the sing. The original meaning was evidently 'writing-tablet, leaf, or sheet': cf. Venantius Fortunatus Carm. vii. 18, 19 'barbara fraxineis pingatur runa tabellis', also OS. thia bôk the writing-tablet, 'pugillaris' Luke i. 63 (in Heliand 232, 235), OE. bóc charter: in pl. tablets, written sheets, hence 'book,' a sense subseq.

Generally thought to be etymologically connected with the name of the beech-tree, OE. bóc, bóce, ON. bók :—(see BEECH), the suggestion being that inscriptions were first made on beechen tablets, or cut in the bark of beech-trees; but there are great difficulties in reconciling the early forms of the two words, seeing that bôk-s 'writing-tablet' is the most primitive of all.]

3. gen. A written or printed treatise or series of treatises, occupying several sheets of paper or other substance fastened together so as to compose a material whole.

In this wide sense, referring to all ages and countries, a book comprehends a treatise written on any material (skin, parchment, papyrus, paper, cotton, silk, palm leaves, bark, tablets of wood, ivory, slate, metal, etc.), put together in any portable form, e. g. that of a long roll, or of separate leaves, hinged, strung, stitched, or pasted together.

a. spec. (In reference to modern things.) Such a treatise occupying numerous sheets or leaves fastened together at one edge called the back, so as to be opened at any particular place, the whole being protected by binding or covers of some kind. But, since either the form of the book or its subject may be mainly or exclusively the object of attention, this passes on either side into

b. The material article so made up, without regard to the nature of its contents, even though its pages are occupied otherwise than with writing or printing, or are entirely blank (cf. 9): e. g. 'a handsome book', i. e. a trophy of the binder's art, 'a tiny book,' one that may be put in the waistcoat pocket.

c. A literary composition such as would occupy one or more volumes, without regard to the material form or forms in which it actually exists; 'an intellectual composition, in prose or verse, at least of sufficient extent to make one volume' (Littré s.v. livre). In this sense Carlyle described himself as 'a writer of books'.

It is not now usual to call a (modern) literary composition in manuscript a 'book', unless we think of its printing as a thing to follow in due course. In sense b every volume is a 'book'; whilst in sense c one 'book' may occupy several volumes; and on the other hand one large volume may contain several 'books,' i. e. literary works originally published as distinct books. No absolute definition of a 'book' in this sense can be given: in general, a short literary composition (especially if ephemeral in character, and therefore also in form) receives some other name, as tract, pamphlet, sketch, essay, etc.

Boom (būm), sb.[3] U. S. [This and its verb (BOOM v.[2]) have arisen recently in U. S.: it is not clear whether the vb. is from the sb., or conversely. The actual origin is also a matter of conjecture; probably, it consisted in a particular application of Boom sb.[1] and its vb., with reference not so much to the sound, as to the suddenness and rush, with which it is accompanied. Cf. esp. Boom v.[1] 1 c., and 2. But association, original or subsequent, with other senses of Boom, is also possible, and the actual use of the word has not been regulated by any distinct etymological feeling, so that no derivation will account for all its applications]

Boom (būm), v.[1] Forms: 5 bombon, bummyn, bumbyn, bome, 6 bomme, 7- bomb, (9 bome), 8- boom. [Of imitative origin; whether original in Eng. it is impossible to determine: cf. Ger. bummen, Du. bommen, of similar meaning, ODu. bom a drum; also Bomb, which in its origin is closely allied. The development of sense 2 is not quite clear; it may be a different word.

But in Sc., the equivalent 'bum' is used both of the hum of bees, etc., of the sound of a passing shot or stone, and of the rushing motion of a stone or the like, as 'to bum stones at any one', to kick an object and 'send it bumming i. e. spinning) away'.]

Collins (Judge Advocate of the colony when founded in 1788) collected a short vocabulary of Port Jackson words, in which wo-mur-ring occurs among 'names of clubs'. (He has also wo-mer-ra the throwing stick, which some later writers erroneously identify with the boomerang.) In a short vocabulary of the extinct language of George's River, Botany Bay, printed by Ridley, Kámilarói 203, are womrá 'throwing stick for spear', bómarin 'boomerang'. Boomerang was given as 'the Port Jackson term' by Capt. King in 1827; its exact relation to wo-mur-ring and bómarin, and the relations of these to each other can perhaps not now be determined. A very graphic account of the use of the weapon (described as 'a bent, edged waddy resembling slightly a Turkish scimitar') is in the Sydney Gazette of 23 Dec. 1804: the name boomerang has not been found in that paper up to 1823.]

Boor (bŭər). Forms: (5 boueer), 6–7 boore, bour, (7 bore, boar), 7–boor (9 bauer). [A word of involved history in and out of English, though the ultimate etymology is clear enough. The 16th c. bour, boore, may possibly have been native Eng., repr. an earlier bûr*, short for OE. gebûr 'dweller, husbandman, farmer, countryman' (Bosw.), a deriv. of búr 'dwelling, house, cottage, Bower', f. the verb root, bū to dwell: cf. the compound neighbour:—ME. nexebur:—OE. néahgebûr 'nigh-dweller', also modern East Anglian Boh 'neighbour' as a form of address. But on the whole, in its literary use, the word is more likely to have been adopted from LG. bûr, Du. boer: see the quots. under sense 2, and Boer. These words are themselves etymological equivalents (or nearly so) of OE. gebûr; the OHG. form being gibûr, gibûro, MHG. gebûr, gebûre, MLG. gebûr, and bûr (occurring 1365), mod.LG. buur (made bauer in mod.HG.), MDu. ghebure, ghebuer, and buer; also (late) geboer, which was not properly a Du. form, but probably, according to Cosijn, adopted from Frisian, or, according to Franck, from the LG. on the eastern frontier of the Netherlands. This last is in mod Du. boer. The original sense of W Ger. gibûr, gibûro, was 'inmate of a bûr or Bower, fellow-occupier of a dwelling, farm, or village; neighbour, mate'. Partly from being preserved mainly in rural use, but largely from association with the vb. bûan (MHG., MDu. bûwen, Ger. bauen, Du. bouwen) to inhabit, cultivate, till (of which, as we have seen, it was not a derivative, though a cognate word from same root bū-), its original connexion with bûr, Bower, was lost, and the sense more and more confined to that of 'peasant, rustic', and thence 'clown'.

While mod. Ger. has merged the word in form with bauer, agent-noun from bauen 'to cultivate, to build', mod. Du., on the contrary, makes a distinction in use between the native buur (MDu. ghebure, ghebuer) 'neighbour', and the adopted boer (MDu. geboer) 'peasant, husbandman, farmer, clown, knave at cards', and keeps both distinct from bouwer 'tiller, builder' (though in MDu. the latter was used in senses subsequently taken up by gebuer, boer.]

Booty (bū·ti), sb. Forms: 5–6 botye, buty, 6 boty, bootye, bootie, (7 Sc. bouty), 6– booty. [The mod. as well as the early forms, point to a ME. long ō, and thus to connexion with bōt, BOOT sb.[1] advantage, and v.[1] to profit. But there is no accounting for such a formation from bōt, boot directly; and it is generally held that the English word is due to an adaptation of some word cognate with Ger. beute, F. butin (or the latter itself) influenced in form by association with bōt, boot. The Teutonic words in question are ON. býti 'exchange, barter', connected with býta 'to exchange'; also 'to deal out, distribute'; MDu. and MLG. büte (MG. bûte, MHG. biute, mod.G. beute, mod.Du. buit), all with the sense 'booty'. Butin, from French, was used side by side with boty, booty during the 16th c., and it is curious that the first known instances of both occur in Caxton's Chesse, within a few lines of each other: see BUTIN. Caxton has also buty (see 1491), and in 17th c. we find an instance of bootyn for butin: but on the whole the contact of the two forms appears to be slight. The shorter form BOOT (sb.[2]), and the related BOOT v.[2] BOOTER (freebooter), BOOTING, are all later.

(An early but dubiously genuine use appears under BOOTY a., which, if really used by Lydgate c 1430, would carry the question farther back, but leave it still more obscure.)] Bore (bōəɹ), sb.[2] [This, and its vb. BORE[2] arose after 1750; etymology unknown.

(Usually supposed to be f. BORE v.[3], which is then regarded as a fig. use of BORE v.[1], with the notion of 'persistent annoyance' (cf. Ger. drillen). But it seems impossible in this way to account for sense 1 of the sb., which is apparently the source of the other senses, and of the verb itself. If related at all to BORE v.[1] or sb.[1], the connexion must be much more indirect; possibly there is an allusion to some now forgotten anecdote. The phrase 'French bore' naturally suggests that the word is of French origin; bourre padding, hence (in 18th c.) triviality, bourrer to stuff, to satiate, might be thought of; but without assuming some intermediate link these words do not quite yield the required sense.)]

†1. The malady of ennui, supposed to be specifically 'French', as 'the spleen' was supposed to be English; a fit of ennui or sulks; a dull time.

Borough (bʌɹə, bʌɹō). Forms: 1 burg, burus, 1–3 burh, 2 burch, buru(g)h, (burehg), beriz, 2–3 buruh, 3 burrh (Orm.), burwe, buri, 3–4 burz, buruz, borh, borz, boruz, boru, 4 burw, burze, borz(e, bourz, borou, borwz, borwgh, borw(e, borgh(e, 4–5 burghe, 4–6 (also Sc. 7–9) burgh, borogh, 4–7 borowe, 5 burwgh, borowgh, burwhe, borugh(e, burwe, bourg, 5–6 bourgh, 5–7 burrow(e, 6 borrowe, (bourg), burow, 6–7 boroughe, 6–8 burrough, (7 burrowghe, 8 borrough), 6– borough. Dat. sing. 1 byriz, burze, 2 birie, berie, 3 biri, burie, buri. [Common Teut.: OE. burg, burh = OFris. burch, OS. burg (MDu. burch, borch, Du. burg), OHG. burug (MHG. burc(g-), mod.G. burg), ON. (Sw., Da.) borg, Goth. baurgs:—OTeut. burg-s* str. fem. App. f. same root as OTeut. berg-an* str. vb. 'to shelter': see Bergh v.; but the phonology is not quite clear. In Germaa and ON. the word is recorded chiefly in the primary sense of 'fortress, castle', but there are traces of the sense of 'town, civic community', which is found in Goth. and OE., and may therefore be assumed to have been developed in OTeut. Of the immense variety of spellings current in ME., burrough became the prevalent one in early mod. Eng., but was subsequently displaced by borough in England and Ireland, while the form established in Scotland was Burgh, q.v. The Danish Borg and Fr. Bourg have also been used by historical writers in special senses. See also Burrow, Berry sb.[3]

Like other fem. consonantal stems, the OE. burg had vowel change (byrig) in gen. and dat. sing., and nom. acc. plural, which survived in dat. sing. to the 13th c. This dative, biri, beris, buri, was also at times used for the nominative; whence the modern Bury, -bury, in place-names.]

†1. A fortress, castle, or citadel. Obs. (Unequivocal instances of this sense are rare, even in OE. In quot. 1394 the word denotes simply a large building; and 1425 is quite doubtful.)

†2. A fortified town; a town possessing municipal organization (cf. OE. burhwaru body of citizens); more generally, any inhabited place larger than a village. (The three notions were originally co-extensive. When the word became restricted to the mod. sense (3) its wider sense passed to town.) Obs.

3. A town possessing a municipal corporation and special privileges conferred by royal charter (hence the sovereign is said to create a borough). Also a town which sends representatives to parliament. (A municipal borough often differs in territorial extent from the parliamentary borough of the same name.) The word is commonly restricted to towns which do not possess the more dignified title of City. For the Scottish uses, see Burgh.

3. Hist. (usually with obs. spelling.) A friðborh (lit. 'pledge of peace') or tithing, which in early England was an association of ten neighbouring householders who were jointly answerable before the law, 'so that if one of the ten men offend, the other nine may bring him to right'; afterwards called liberum plegium and Frankpledge, the word friþ 'peace' having been corrupted into 'free'. There is no direct evidence that in OE. borh was used as = friðborh, but in 16th c. borowe appears as a synonym of 'tithing' or 'frankpledge', and from that period to the present time many writers have confused it with Borough. Cf. Borrowhead, Borsholder.

[OE. borgian, f. borg, borh pledge, surety (BORROW sb.); cf. OHG. borgôn to take heed, f. borg* (?object of care), MHG., mod. G. borgen to borrow, f. MHG. borg pledge.]

I. To give security for, take on pledge.

1. trans. a. To take (a thing) on pledge or security given for its safe return; b. To take (a thing) on credit, on the understanding of returning it, or giving an equivalent; hence, to obtain or take the temporary use of (a thing recognized as being the property of another, to whom it is returnable). Const. of, rarely from, formerly at.

The essential notion of borrowing originally was the security given for the safety of the thing so taken: the essential notion now is that the thing is the property of another and liable to be returned, the only security given being often the undertaking, formal or implied, that it shall be so returned when we have used it.

2. fig. To render oneself indebted for; to make temporary use of (something not one's own); used, e.g. of temporal possessions, with notion of their being only lent to us, not given. More usually of immaterial things: as, to adopt (thoughts, expressions, modes of conduct) from another person, or (words, idioms, customs, etc.) from a foreign language or people; to obtain (a temporary favour) by request; to derive (one's authority, etc.) from another, as opposed to holding it by inherent right; to draw (a comparison, inference, suggestion) from some source alien to the subject in hand; to adopt (something) for other than its normal purpose. Const. from, of, formerly at.

As applied to the adoption of foreign words or customs, it properly implies that the adoption is merely temporary; but this restriction is now often disregarded, esp. by writers on philology; cf. LOAN-WORD.

[ME. bocche-n, of uncertain etymology: having apparently no original relation to BOTCH sb.[1], though the words may have subsequently influenced each other. Prof. Skeat suggests for the vb. a LG. origin, comparing MDu. butsen, (1) to strike, beat, (2) to repair (Oudemans), app. related to Du. botsen to knock, dash, Ger. dial. butschen, butzen to strike, knock; according to Franck an onomatopœic word of echoic origin. But the sense 'repair' in Du. butsen seems to be recent, while in English it appears in Wyclif: also there is no sense 'knock' in English, so that connexion with the continental words is very doubtful. Perhaps the Eng. word is an onomatopœia related in its genesis to 'patch'; cf. Ger. batzen to patch. See BODGE.]

No trace of this extended form appears in OE.; the simpler form bei, Bo existed side by side with both until 14–15th c., when the former died out.

The suffix in ON. báðar and the equivalent forms is believed to be unconnected with that in Goth. bajōþs both (declined as sb plur.), and to represent the definite article (in Goth. þai, þō which seems to have coalesced with the simple bai, ba owing to the tendency to say 'both the' instead of merely 'both'; cf. Goth. ba þō skipa 'both the ships' Luke v. 8. The constructions of both in Eng. follow those of the earlier Bo and to some extent those of ALL; examples of its use as attribute to a sb. plur. without intervening possessive, demonstrative, or article, do not appear until after Bo had become obsolete.]

A. adj. I. Proper sense and normal uses.

The one and the other; referring to two specially designated persons or things, implying that two and no more are so designated, and emphasizing the fact that neither of them is excepted from the statement made; equivalent to 'the two, and not merely one of them'.

The following Constructions occur:

1. absolutely. From 14th c. sometimes the both (obs.). In early mod.Eng. sometimes inflected as a sb., with genitive both's.

Eng.* II. 113 Both were Tories: both were men of hot temper and strong prejudices.

2. In apposition with a plural sb. or pronoun.

When referring to the subject of a sentence, both was in early ME. usually separated from it, and placed after the vb. or whole predication. This is still common dialectally. In the literary language, both is still placed after the verb be (occasionally also after become, seem, appear, etc.), and after the auxiliary in a compound tense.

They have both gone. The brothers might both have come.

3. In attributive relation to a plural sb.:

a. with a defining word (demonst. or poss. adj., 'def. article', genitive case, etc.): Both precedes the defining word, as 'both my friends saw it'. It may also (with greater emphasis) follow the sb., esp. when the subject of the sentence, as 'my friends both saw it'. (In this case it further follows the verb be or an auxiliary, as 'my friends had both seen it'; cf. 2).

The constructions are the same when there is ellipsis of the sb. after demonst. or poss. pron., as 'I need both these', 'these are both mine'. For the colloq. both of before sb. see 6.

c. without defining word. Both regularly precedes the sb., but in lively or humorous address may sometimes follow it, as in quot. 1597. Both ways: in both respects.

4. In attrib. relation to a plural pronoun:

a. in nom. or obj. Both follows the pronoun, as 'they both went'. (With be and auxiliaries it further follows the verb: cf. 2). In ME. both might precede the pronoun, 'both they went'; of this usage both which still occurs; but the regular modern construction with both preceding the pronoun is 'both of us', 'both of whom', 'both of which' (see 6).

†b. in genit. pl. with a sb., as our, your, her (= their), their bather, bother, bothens, botheres, etc. (afterwards both, which sometimes preceded the pron.) = of us, you, them both. Obs.

Latterly the sb. often improperly took the plural form by attraction of the pronoun; this idiom is still in vulgar use, as 'It is both your faults,' 'she is both their mothers'.

5. In attrib. relation to two substantives or pronouns (or a sb. and pron.) coupled by and, the same constructions obtain as in 3: as 'both John and I came', 'John and George both came', 'the brother and sister are both dead', but this is practically indistinguishable from the adverbial use in B 1.

6. With of: Both of is now used before pronouns and pronominal words, instead of the simple both (see 4). The use with a sb., as 'both of these arguments', is colloquial, but scarcely ever occurs in literature.

B. adv. (conj.)

1. Preceding two homogeneous words (sbs., adjs., vbs., advbs., or preps.) or phrases, coupled by and, both adds emphasis to the sentence by suggesting a contrast with the statement as it would have been had one of the terms been omitted. Both . . and is thus nearly = not only . . but. (Both in this construction is not now preceded by a genitive case or an adj. of any kind, as in quots. 1641, 1690, 1834).

As both . . and corresponds to the Latin et . . et, it is usual to class both as a conjunction; but it more properly belongs to the same grammatical category with Even. This use of both arises out of the construction in A 5, and in 'both the king and the queen spoke', 'the king and the queen both honour him', 'Mercury and Venus are both inferior planets', both may still be viewed as an adjective in attributive relation to the two substantives. But in the extended use 'both juster and kinder' or 'both by day and by night', 'he both walks and runs', it can no longer be so treated.

Both(e, obs. form of Boot, Booth, Bote.

Botham, -em, obs. form of Bottom.

Bother (bɒ·ðəɹ), v. colloq. Also 8 bodder, Sc. bauther, bather. [Etymology unknown; the earliest instances occur in the writings of Irishmen (T. Sheridan, Swift, Sterne), and the word has long formed part of the vocabulary of the comic Irishman of fiction and the stage. This suggests an Anglo-Irish origin; but no suitable etymon has been found in Irish.

The Irish bódhar deaf, bódhaírim I deafen (suggested by Crofton Croker), and buaidhirt trouble, affliction, buaidhrim I vex (proposed by Garnett) alike labour under the difficulty that the spoken words do not suggest bodder or bother. Boulder-stone (bōu·ldəɹstōun). Forms: 3–6 bulder-ston(e, 7 boother-, bowther-stone, 8–9 bowlder-stone, 7– boulder-stone. [Etymology obscure. With ME. bulderston, cf. Sw. dial. (E. Gothl.) bullersten a large stone in a stream, one which makes a rumbling noise in the water, as opposed to klappersten a smaller pebble; f. Sw. buller noise, roar, bullr-a to roar, rumble + sten = STONE. This gives a passable sense; but no corresponding word is known elsewhere in Swedish, Old or New, Icelandic, Norwegian, or Danish; so that actual relation between the North. Eng. and Swedish dialect word cannot be asserted.

No words answering to Sw. buller, bullra, exist in Old or New Icelandic; but Da. has bulder 'tumbling noise', buldre 'to racket, rattle, make a noise'. If either these words were in use in North. Eng., or a compound bulder-steen* in Da., it would be natural to find here the origin of the Eng. word; but no such connecting links are found. The verb and sb. seem indeed to exist in the Sc. buller 'to bellow, roar', buller 'bellowing, roar, loud gurgling sound', but this is not quite the shade of sense required, while the form it would yield is not bulder-, bowlder-, bowther-, or boother-, as actually found in North. Eng. dial., but bullerstane*, which is not found.]

Bounce (bauns), v. Forms: 3 bunsen, 4–7 bounse, 6–7 bownce, 6– bounce.

[The origin of BOUNCE v., sb.[1], int. (adv.) is obscure, and their mutual relations complicated. ME. bunsen agrees in form and meaning with mod.Du. bons a thump, bonsen (LG. bunsen, HG. dial. bumbsen) to beat, thump, thwack; but there is no early record of these words, and perh. they may be related to the Eng. word merely as parallel onomatopœic formations. Early in 16th c. we find the interjectional use of bounce (= LG. and HG. dial. bums !) to imitate the report of a gun or other loud sudden noise, and (a little later) to express sudden or violent movement. About the same time the vb. (previously seldom occurring) became common in its original sense 'to beat', but with the notion of noise or vehemence more conspicuous—'to knock, bang'; it also acquired the senses 'to make a banging or explosive noise', and 'to make a sudden or violent movement of a bounding nature'. The sb. is also found in all these senses early in the 16th c. Whether these were natural developments of the original sense, as expressing phenomena which often accompany a knock or thump, or at least are present in the bang of cannon (which had come into use just before these extensions of bounce), or whether there has been influence of any other words is not clear. The development of sense however is to a great extent parallel to that of BANG, which has dialectally even the sense of 'bounce into a room', etc.]

Bouse, bowse (bu͝z, bau̯z), v.[1] Forms: 3, 6– bouse, bowse, 6–7 bous(e: see also Booze. [ME. bousen, app. a. MDu. būsen, early mod.Du. buizen to drink to excess, corresp. to Ger. bausen in same sense. The origin is not quite clear: Kluge takes the Ger. vb. to be derived from baus, MHG. bûs blown-up condition, tumidity; but the Du. seems directly related to buise a large drinking-vessel. Both vb. and sb. occur (once) in ME.; but they seem to have become generally known in 16th c. as words of thieves' and beggars' cant, whence they passed into slang and colloquial use. Perh. the use in Falconry came down independently from ME. Most commonly pronounced bū̆z, and since 18th c. often phonetically written Booze, q. v.]

Bow (bau), sb.[3] Naut. Also 7 bowe, 8 bough. [Recorded only since 1600. Corresp. in form and sense to LG. bôg, Du. boeg, Da. boug, bov, Sw. bog, all with senses 'shoulder of man or beast', and 'bow of a ship'. The older Teut. forms were ON. bóg-r, OHG. buog (MHG. buoc), MDu. boech 'shoulder of man or beast', OE. bóg bóh 'shoulder, upper arm', and 'bough of a tree':—OTeut. bōgu-s.* corresp. to Gr. πῶχυς, πῆχυς, and Skr. bāhu-s 'arm'. Bow is thus in origin the same word as Bough, but while the latter has come down direct from OE. in one of the OE. senses, bow has been adopted at a later time from LG., Du., or Da., in the special sense of the 'shoulders' of a boat or ship, developed in the maritime speech of one or other of these, but not known to OE. or ME. Bough and bow have thus widely diverged, the earlier meaning of 'shoulder, arm', not being retained by either. (Not related to Bow sb.[1], nor to Bow v.[1], though probably now associated with the latter in the popular etymological consciousness, as appears from most attempts to explain it.]

The causal of this was OTeut. baugjan, OE. bíegan, býgan, weak verb: see Bey v. In early ME. there was some confusion of forms in writing, due to the ambiguous use of u for both OE. ú, and Fr. u = ú, OE. y. As early as the 13th c. bow began to usurp the sense of bey, which became obs. in the 14th c.; and coincidently with this extension of sense, bow began to take a weak pa. t. and pa. pple.

The normal modern spelling would be BOLL which came down to 17th c. in sense of 'round vessel', and is still used in sense of 'round seed-vessel'; but the early ME. pronunciation of -ōll as -bwl (cf. roll, poll, toll, etc.), has left its effects in the modern spelling bowl in the sense of 'vessel', which is thus at once separated in form from other senses of its own (see BOLL *sb.*¹), and confounded with BOWL *sb.*² a ball, from Fr. boule.]

1. 'A [round] vessel to hold liquids, rather wide than deep; distinguished from a cup, which is rather deep than wide.' J. Usually hemispherical or nearly so.

Historically, a bowl is distinguished from a basin by its more hemispherical shape; a 'basin' being proportionally shallower and wider, or with the margin curved outward, as in the ordinary wash-hand basin; but the actual use of the words is capricious, and varies from place to place; in particular, the ordinary small earthenware vessels, used for porridge, soup, milk, sugar, etc., which are historically bowls, and are so called in Scotland and in U. S., are always called in the south-east of England, and hence, usually in literary English, basins. The earlier usage remains in salad-bowl, finger-bowl (now also basin), punch-bowl, and the convivial or social bowl (see b).

Teut. langs.: Du. boegspriet, LG. bogspret, Ger. bug-, bugspriet (from LG. or Du.), Sw. bogsprot, Da. bogspryd; in all connected with the ship's Bow, and with a word, in OE. sprēot pole (ME. spret, spreet), Du. spriet spear, javelin, Sw. sprōt insect's feeler. Cf. also OHG. spriusan, MHG. spriusen to prop. The origin seems to lie between LG., Du., and English: in the latter sprēot was itself used in a nautical sense in OE. and ME. (see SPRIT). But against the compound bow-sprit being of English rise, are the late appearance of bow in the language, and the numerous perverted forms with bore, boar, bolt, bold, bole, bowle, which seem to show that the connexion with bow was not evident to English sailors, either in sense or pronunciation. (Quotations for the word are very rare before 1590.)

A member of a peculiar order of the old Russian aristocracy, next in rank to a knyas or 'prince', who enjoyed many exclusive privileges, and held all the highest military and civil offices: the order was abolished by Peter the Great, and the word is in Russia only a historical term, though still often erroneously applied by English newspaper writers to Russian landed proprietors. In Roumania the boiér still exist as a privileged class. (The Eng. boyar appears to have been taken from the plural; boyard is an erroneous French spelling.)

Bracket (bræ·kĕt). Also 6-7 bragget, 7 bra.zet(t, 8 brecate, brockett. [The earliest form bragget appears to be (either directly or through F. braguette) ad. Sp. bragueta, dim. of braga :— L. brāca, sing. of brācæ breeches; the form bracket is a corruption, perh. influenced by It. bracheta, dim. of braca :—L. brāca.

The Eng. senses are difficult to account for, but may in part be based on unrecorded senses of the Sp., It., or Fr. words. Prof. Skeat suggests that the 'bracket of architecture may have been so called from its resemblance to the 'codpiece' of a pair of breeches (Sp. bragueta meant both 'codpiece' and 'bracket'). Further, a name suggested by 'breeches' may naturally have been applied to an apparatus consisting of two limbs set at an angle, like the 'bracket' of shipbuilding, or to appliances used in pairs, like the 'brackets' of a gun-carriage. Then, as a bracket of any kind was generally used for support, the erroneous etymology from L. brachium 'arm' or its Romance derivatives presented itself, and seems to have affected the development of senses. Cf. also OF. bracon and braquant 'supporting beam'.]

Brag (bræg), sb.[1] Also 5–8 bragg(e, 6 braggue. [The etymology of Brag sb[1], vb., adj., and their mutual relations are uncertain. There are several related words in 16th c. French, braguer 'to flaunt, brave, brag', bragueur, braguerie; bragard 'gay, gallant, braggard, braggadochio-like', bragarder 'to brave it, to brag, vaunt', bragardise, etc. (all in Cotgr.); but as these appear so late, while some of the Eng. words go back to 1300, the latter cannot be referred to a French origin (though the later braggart and braggery may). The words are not in other Romanic langs., and their origin has been variously sought in Celtic and in Norse: see Diez. It is doubtful whether the adj. or sb. is the earlier in E.g.; both appear before the vb. The order of senses is also uncertain Diez conjectured that the Fr. might be from ON. brak 'creaking noise' (Sw. brak bounce, Da. brag, braka (Da. bragge) 'to creak, crack, insolenter se gerere' Haldorss.; others have suggested ON. bragr 'the best, the foremost, the boast or toast (of anything)'; also 'poetry'. See Diez, Wedgwood, Skeat.]

In OE. the g of the root was often omitted, with lengthening of the vowel (brédan, bréd, brúdon, bróden), but the diphthongal form (breyde, etc.) prevailed in ME. The pa. pple. had in 13–15th c. the form broyden, in 14–16th browden, sometimes in 14–15th c. brawden; the phonetic history of which presents some difficulties. By 1400 the original strong pa. t was displaced by the weak brayded, which in the 15th c. had also extended to the pa. pple., though browden continued in Sc. at least till 1600. From the strong forms of the pa. pple. appear to have arisen the newer synonymous weak verbs BROID, BROWD, BRAWDE q.v.; see also BROIDER, browder, brawder.]

Braidism (brē·diz'm). Med. [f. the surname Braid.] The process of producing sleep or trance by causing the patient's attention to be intensely concentrated on some visual object; this process, which had long been practised under the name of MESMERISM, was first scientifically applied, and its effects accounted for, by Dr. James Braid in 1842. (Braid's own name for the process was HYPNOTISM, which is still the one most frequent in scientific use; the popular term MESMERISM is not employed by medical writers, as it is understood to imply an explanation of the phenomena differing from that of Braid.)

1882 BASTIAN in Quain's Dict. Med. 732 Braidism certainly deserves more attention than it has received. Ibid. 973 The too ready adoption of hypnosis or Braidism may do harm rather than good.

1. The convoluted mass of nervous substance contained in the skull of man and other vertebrates. By some earlier scientific writers restricted to the anterior portion (in Latin cerebrum) as opposed to the posterior portion (BRAINLET, cerebellum); but this distinction is now expressed by the Lat. words, which have been adopted in scientific use, and brain in technical as well as in popular language includes the entire organ; it is also applied by extension to the analogous but less developed organs of invertebrate animals.

In 16th c. it became usual to employ the pl. instead of the sing. when mere cerebral substance, and not a definite organic structure, was meant; this usage still continues: we say 'a dish of brains', 'a disease of the brain'.

1. a. Historically: The general name for all alloys of copper with tin or zinc (and occasionally other base metals). To distinguish alloys of copper and tin, the name BRONZE has recently been adopted (Johnson 1755-73 explains the new word bronze as 'brass'). Hence

b. In strict modern use, as distinguished from 'bronze': A yellow-coloured alloy of copper and zinc, usually containing about a third of its weight of zinc.

The OE. brœs was, usually at least, an alloy of copper and tin (= BRONZE); in much later times the alloy of copper and zinc came gradually into general use, and became the ordinary 'brass' of England; though in reference to ancient times, and esp. to the nations of antiquity, 'brass' still meant the older alloy. When works of Greek and Roman antiquity in 'brass' began to be critically examined, and their material discriminated, the Italian word for 'brass' (Bronzo, bronzo) came into use to distinguish this 'ancient brass' from the current alloy. Corinthian brass: a reputed alloy of gold, silver, and copper.

The early forms in bru-, bry-, app. of English or Anglo-French origin, are due perhaps to the obscurity of the first vowel. The 15–16th c. forms in ber, bar- were northern: see Brattising. The original sense became obs. before 1500. To modern times the word has come down in local use, chiefly in connexion with coal-mining, in the forms brettis (Derbyshire), brattice (Newcastle, etc.), brattish. Although brettis is the best form etymologically, brattice has become more generally known, and accepted in literary use; brattish has given the architectural brattishing.]

After the discovery of the New World, the name was extended and gradually transferred to the similar wood of a South American species (C. echinata), which has given its name to the land of Brazil, and to other species, natives of the West Indies and Central America, 'all valuable to the dyer, producing various tints of red, orange, and peach colour'.

Bread (bred), sb.[1] Forms: 1 brēad, 2–3 bread, (2 brad), 2–3 brēd, 2–7 bred, (3–5 bredd), 3–6 brede, (4 bryad, bryead), 4–6 breed(e, 5–7 breade, 6– bread, 5– Sc. breid, (6–7 bredde, 7 braid, 9 dial. brade). [OE. brēad, pl. brēadru: repr. WGer. braud*, and corresp. to OFris. brād, OS. brōd (MDu. broet-de, Du. brood, LG. brōt, brood), OHG., MHG. brōt (Ger. brod, brot); ON. brauð (Sw., Da. bröd):—OTeut. braudos-*, a neuter -es stem, not preserved in Gothic. The original Teutonic name for bread survives in the modern Loaf (OE. hlāf, OHG. hlaib, ON. hleifr, Goth. hlaifs, hlaibs, OTeut. hlaibo-z*) formerly in all the langs. in the sense of 'bread' and 'loaf'. Braudos-, brōd, brēad, appears to have originally meant 'pieces, bit. fragment, L. frustum': but already in OS. and OHG. it had the acquired sense of 'bread'; 'OHG. shows no clear distinction of meaning between brōt and hleib' (Sievers). In OE. brēad is rare: the later Blickling Glosses have the pl. brēadru, 'frusta' (i. e. 'pieces, bits'). The other examples are all Northumbrian, in the Lindisfarne (& Rushw.) gloss; viz. John xiii. 27, 30 translating buccella, the 'mouthful' given to Judas, for which the Ags. Gospels have bitan, Wyclif morsel, Rhemish morsel. In verse 26 where the Vulgate twice renders the same Gr. word (ψωμίον bit, piece) 'panem', later versions 'bread', the Ags. has f, Lindisf. laf, which seems to show that brēad was not yet identified with panis. But in John vi. 23, brēad actually represents panem of the Vulgate (= ἄρτον), and hlāf of the Ags. version: where however broken bread is in question. Before 1200 bread had quite displaced hlāf as the name of the substance, leaving to the latter the sense 'loaf' which it has since retained. It thus appears that a word originally meaning 'piece, bit, frustum', has passed through the senses of 'piece of bread', 'broken bread', into that of 'bread' as a substance; while at the same time the original word for 'bread, loaf, panis' has been restricted to the undivided article as shaped and baked, the 'loaf'. The Lowland Scotch and north. dial. use of piece illustrates anew the first step in this transition, for it is the regular word for a piece of bread, as in 'give the bairn a piece', 'a beggar asking a piece', a 'piece-poke', a 'gie's-a-piece' i. e. a beggar.

So also in Slovenish, 'hrush, "bread" is literally "a piece, something broken off"' (Miklosich, Etym. Wörb. Slav. Spr. 143).

With brōd, brēad, Prof. Sievers connects the Ger. brosame crumb, in OHG. brōsma, OS. brōsmo:—OTeut. braudasmon-, the sense of which confirms the original meaning of braudos-*, and points to some root having the sense of 'break'. OE. brēotan does not answer phonetically. (The preceding facts are, of course, quite inconsistent with the conjecture that bread is a deriv. of the verb-root bru to Brew.)]

†1. (Only in OE.) Bit, piece, morsel (of food). See above in Etymology.
